
What to Do If You're Stuck

Troubleshooting the 60-Minute AI Audit Call

Conducting an audit is a skill. Even with a perfect plan, you might hit a wall. Here is how to navigate the three most common friction points during the call.

"The client keeps asking me for tool recommendations mid-call."

This is a good sign — it means they're engaged. Use the No Solution Rule script every time:

"There are a couple of tools that could handle that — I don't want to give you a generic answer right now. I want to go away and test them against your specific setup, then bring back the right one in the report."

Say it warmly, not defensively. After the second or third time you use it, they'll stop asking and start trusting that the report is going to be worth waiting for.

"The conversation dried up and I ran out of questions."

Go to your cheat sheet. Pick the investigation zone that covers the area of their business you've spent the least time on and open with:

"I want to make sure I understand the [sales/delivery/support] side of things too — can you walk me through what that looks like day to day?"

That phrase restarts any stalled conversation by shifting the focus to a new department.

"I forgot to get numbers on a pain point."

Don't try to reconstruct it from memory. Review the transcript after the call — Fireflies will flag the moments where pain points were mentioned. If the number is genuinely missing, send a quick follow-up message:

"One thing I forgot to ask — roughly how many hours a week is [task] taking your team? Helps me nail the numbers in the report."